VII. Read the passage and complete the summary below with no more than two words for each blank.

Branding has played a large part in consumer behaviour for many years. Why is wearing someone else's brand so important to our society, instead of deciding on our own what is good taste and what is not?

First, wearing branded clothes can tell others where we are on the economic scale. There is a certain order in society and wearing branded products tells those we meet that we are in a lower group, the same group or a higher socioeconomic group than they are, depending on the prestige and price of the items worn.

Second, there is, of course, a sense of pride in ownership. Everyone wants to own beautiful and well-made things, and branded products tend to be of high quality. Each time you shut the car door and hear that classic "thud", it tells you that you have purchased a well-made machine. Every morning when you get up and slip that gold watch over your hand, you take a moment just to appreciate its art.

Finally, branding lets you free from worries. When a man goes shopping for his wife and he knows she likes a certain brand, he doesn't have to think any further than the brand name. Anything that has that particular name on it will please his wife. Individuals no longer think about what is good design or bad; if it has some well-advertised name on it, it must be good. If there is something wrong with the products, we can easily ask for a refund.

Branded products have played an important part in our society. First, we can tell others where we are on the (31) _____ when we wear branded clothes. This often depends on the prestige and the price of the things we wear. Second, these products can give us a sense of (32) _____ in ownership. This is because branded merchandise is often well-made and of high (33) _____. Finally, branding frees you from (34) _____. For example, when a man wants to give his wife a present, anything with a name on it is likely to please her. In case there is a defect in the product purchased, people can demand a (35) _____
