Car-free commutes can be rewarding and vary depending on individual circumstances. One of the most popular options for many commuters is biking. It's a great form of exercise and usually requires less maintenance than a private car. If you are new to this kind of transport, take some time to map out your route first and remember to take advantage of bike lanes.

Another thing you should keep in mind is safety. You're responsible for obeying major traffic signals just as you would be while driving. Install tail lights on your bike and wear reflective gear if you are riding at night or early in the morning. Of course, never forget your helmet!

Some bike commuters even pack clothes to change into when they arrive at work in case they get sweaty. This healthy means of transport is also well-supported by many companies around the world. Some offer quite a range of benefits to those who cycle to work such as bicycle parking and cash incentives to commute-related expense reimbursement.
