Geocaching holds an appeal to teachers and students. It offers a wide variety of physical, social and educational benefits. It goes without saying that geocaching makes its participants physically active. Geocaches are used as a form of point-to-point racing. What distinguishes geocaching from other races is its self-pace. It caters individual needs of physical activity and fitness. Participants can start slowly for geocaches within short distances before moving to next levels with cache sites over longer distances. Varying the environment in which caches are hunted is an excellent way to build and maintain motivation. The sense of achievement and adventure in finding a geocache also brings psychological benefits. Keeping fit by geocaching is of endless interest thanks to its variations in locations, distances and intensity. Additionally, geocaching offers the camaraderie that comes with belonging and being part of a group with common interests. There are now online communities of geocachers who are more than willing to discuss and exchange their geocaching stories. Such communities also organise local events to socialise and talk about their interests. Well designed, geocaching encourages group problem solving and fosters improved group communication. In terms of education, the benefits of geocaching simply know no bounds. It offers an ideal tool to enrich students' knowledge, arouse their interest and curiosity and combine learning with physical exercise. A well-planned geocaching activity in a historical site exploits students' foreknowledge and urges them to explore new information. Above all, it naturally integrates soft skills into an academic lesson. All in all, geocaching is an excellent tool for educators and students.
